While the term "crypto career" might bring to mind technology and engineering professionals, there are a variety of jobs within the field, ranging from full stack developers to compliance officers and community managers. If you're interested in one of these crypto careers, it might be a good idea to move out west. Unsurprisingly, the tech-savvy state of California employs nearly 30 percent of the country's crypto employees -- the most of any state. Of course, if moving across the country is out of the picture, another 15 percent of crypto jobs in the U.S. are remote.

The infographic is titled "Crypto Career Concerns". It features a large pie chart divided into three segments: a large light blue segment, a smaller white segment, and a very small dark blue segment. To the right of the chart, the text "10% of crypto jobs" is displayed in large, bold, black font, with "offer equity" and "offer tokens" in smaller black boxes below it. On the left side, there is a section titled "Money Matters" with the text: "Equity in a company represents partial ownership and is sometimes offered in a salary package". Below this, another section states: "Some crypto positions are offering tokens, tradeable and fungible assets". At the bottom, a horizontal line separates the sections with the text "Often unclear compensation for crypto jobs".
